Makeda Randall Robinson

I just completed this wonderful story by Randall Robinson. It is the story of a young man Graylon, "Gray" March and his grandmother Mattie Gee Florida Harris March "Makeda" born blind in Richmond Va at the turn of the century. Gray and his grandmother have a relationship born of love and respect that grandmothers represent.

The thoughts that run through Gray's mind are certainly designed to be instructive to the reader. It is rare that a novel can be educational in regards to African history, and how it relates to the contemporary African-American but Makeda is that. Randall Robinson has hit a home run with his first novel.

"If you think race relations have really improved over the last 20 years, then you need to read Randall Robinson's Defending the Spirit. From the opening pages of this series of mainly autobiographical essays, Robinson gives no quarter in his role as myth-buster.... Enough food for thought to satisfy an intellectual glutton."
